Introduction

In a previous semester we studied the palazzo as a building type and considered its relevance for a contemporary urban development. This semester we revisited it, but in this instance in the city that it originates from; notably Rome.

While a palazzo and palazzina are typologically similar as their name indicates, they differ in that the first is a large house, while the second is a multioccupancy building that is volumetrically similar to a palazzo.

Students began by investigating the definition of this building type and the manner in which it can support a well-defined urban arrangements. This required the study of precedents and existing models. From the lessons learnt from this study they then developed an urban plan or strategy that tested how palazzine could be added to the 6 sites and neighbourhood chosen for projects.

The positioning and space between buildings was carefully developed by testing a range of options. The character and quality of the public realm and shared amenity was also considered, as well as the impact any project had on its wider context and on its more immediate neighbours. Finally, the design of a single building and the internal organisation of apartments was explored, and how it could be repeated or adjusted in different settings.

The projects contained in this catalogue explore a building type that is rather prevalent in Rome and consider the necessary steps needed to make a contemporary version while maintaining a relationship to its common character.

Acknowledgements

I am indebted to Vittorio Magnago Lampubnani whose encouragement and generous support was instrumental in choosing to work in Rome. We are grateful to him for the lecture on a recent urban history of Rome and attendance at intermediate and final reviews.

We wish to also thank Orsina Simona Pierini for her lecture on housing, and along with Thomas Weaver and Bertie Miller, Mike Guyer, Marianne Baumgartner, Michaela Türtscher offered valuable insights and constructive criticism at the different reviews.

As always, I am deeply grateful to my wonderful assistants, Cristina Roiz de la Parra Solano and Flavia Saggese for organising the activities of the studio and supporting the students throughout the semester. And Marina Aldrovandi for her editorial support.

Last but not least, I thank all the students who worked in the studio this semester: the beautiful work documented here is a testament to their enthusiasm and commitment.
